

Typeface Portrait: Note the Color-Coded Sections

CATEGORY 1: Traits I Aspire to Develop (First Draft)

Note: You'll type this in directly to class companion's revision engine.

I guess resilience is a trait I need. like, my soccer team lost the championship last spring and I kinda just... shut down for a while. I don't want to keep doing that. Life isn't always gonna go how I think, so I probly need to handle failure better, somehow.

also curiosity. I really like when people keep asking "why" even if they already sorta know the answer. my grandpa stares at the sky all the time (he's into astronomy) and it's like he's still amazed. I wanna be like that with books and science stuff... even arguments.

empathy too. I've seen friends fight over dumb stuff. if I could slow down and listen better maybe I'd get their side. feels like an important power but a quiet one.

discipline... yeah I procrastinate a lot. assignments pile up and then I freak out. maybe breaking tasks into smaller steps? idk, just... actually doing the things instead of only dreaming about them.

Traits & Values Reflection 3 / 4

Your reflection on traits like resilience, curiosity, empathy, and discipline is clear and insightful. You provide personal examples, such as your soccer team experience for resilience and your grandpa's curiosity about astronomy. However, to enhance your reflection, try to delve deeper into how you plan to embody these traits in your daily life. For instance, you could discuss specific strategies for handling failure better or give an example of how you might practice empathy in a friendship.

Written Quality 3 / 4

Your writing is generally organized and expressive, with clear examples and insights. The ideas flow well from one trait to another. To improve, consider enhancing the expressiveness by adding more varied sentence structures and transitions. For example, instead of starting a sentence with "also curiosity," you could use a transition like "In addition to resilience, curiosity is another trait I admire because..."

Grammar and Spelling 3 / 4

Your writing contains some grammar and spelling errors, such as "probly" instead of "probably" and "idk" which should be avoided in formal writing. These do not significantly distract from the meaning, but correcting them would polish your work further. For example, use "probably" instead of "probly" to maintain a more formal tone.

CATEGORY 1: Traits I Aspire to Develop

(Updated w/ Class Companion Revision Suggestions)

One trait I hope to cultivate is resilience. When my soccer team lost our championship game last spring, I realized how much I tend to shut down after setbacks. I want to face failure without quitting, because life won't always go the way I plan.

Another trait is curiosity. I admire people who keep asking "why" even when they already know a lot. My grandpa—an amateur astronomer—still looks up at the sky like it's his first time. I want to approach books, science, and even disagreements that way.

I also want to develop empathy. I've seen friendships break over small misunderstandings. Learning to pause, listen, and imagine another person's feelings feels like a kind of quiet power.

Finally, discipline matters to me. I've struggled with procrastination, especially when assignments pile up. Building better habits—like breaking tasks into smaller steps—will help me move from dreaming about goals to actually meeting them.

CATEGORY 2: Priorities, Goals & Vision (First Draft Submitted to Class Companion) biggest thing right now is... finishing high school without burning out. school's important but so is not losing my mind or my friends.

last semester I wanted my essay scores up—like at least one level on the rubric. plan was something like: talk to my teacher sometimes, swap drafts with someone, set study blocks. I tried a “two-pass” revision where I fix big stuff first then small grammar things. think it kinda worked.

later on, I picture maybe environmental science? or policy? I want my voice to count in climate change stuff. even little actions—like Green Club or creek cleanups—feel like I'm doing something.

Goals & Priorities 3 / 4

You've identified clear goals, such as finishing high school strong and improving your essay scores. Your plan to meet with your teacher, swap drafts, and set study blocks is a concrete strategy. To enhance your score, consider adding more detail to your long-term goals in environmental science or policy. For example, describe specific steps you plan to take to explore these fields, like internships or specific courses.

Written Quality 3 / 4

Your writing is generally organized and mostly expressive. The sections are clear, and your ideas are understandable. To improve, try to enhance the expressiveness and flow by connecting your ideas more smoothly. For instance, use transitions to connect your current goals with your future aspirations.

Grammar and Spelling 3 / 4

Your writing has some minor grammar or spelling errors, but they do not seriously distract from the meaning. For example, consider capitalizing the beginning of sentences and using more formal language. This will help polish your writing further.

CATEGORY 2: Priorities, Goals & Vision (Updated with Revisions)

My biggest priority right now is finishing high school strong while keeping balance in my life. Academics matter, but so does my mental health and my relationships.

A specific goal I set last semester was to raise my essay scores by one full level on the rubric. I made a plan: meet with my teacher during office hours once a month, swap drafts with a classmate for feedback, and block out two study sessions each week. A strategy that worked was using a “two-pass” revision—first fixing big-picture organization, then tackling sentence-level details.

Long term, I picture myself studying environmental science or policy. My priority is to work toward a future where my voice matters in conversations about climate change. Even small steps—like joining the campus Green Club or volunteering for creek cleanups—make me feel part of something bigger.

CATEGORY 3: Reader, Writer, Thinker (First Draft)

Reader: when a text confuses me I usually reread it or google for summaries. but sometimes struggling with it helps? like with “Dover Beach,” I finally saw how “Sea of Faith” was like today’s uncertainty.

Writer: I write way better when I actually care. my free-write about grandma’s garden felt easy, unlike a lab report. to sort my thoughts I move sticky notes around on my desk—kinda messy but works.

Thinker: I’m noticing how words shape opinions. a climate debate showed me same info can sound urgent or like overreacting depending on wording. I’d like to use language in a good way—convince people, inform them, maybe even comfort.

this whole self-portrait feels more like a rough compass than a perfect map... traits keep me steady, goals might change, but at least I’ve got a direction.

Reader/Writer Identity 4 / 4

Great job demonstrating self-awareness and reflection about your identity as a reader, writer, and thinker! You provided clear examples, such as how rereading or searching for summaries helps you with difficult texts like “Dover Beach.” Your insights into how language shapes opinions, as seen in the climate debate, show a strong understanding of language use. Keep up the thoughtful reflection!

Written Quality 3 / 4

Your writing is generally organized and expressive. You’ve effectively conveyed your thoughts and experiences, making it understandable. However, consider enhancing the flow between your ideas for a smoother reading experience. For example, adding transitions between sections about reading, writing, and thinking could help connect them more seamlessly.

Grammar and Spelling 3 / 4

Your writing contains some minor grammar issues, such as capitalization errors. These don’t seriously distract from the meaning, but addressing them could polish your work further. For instance, capitalizing the beginning of sentences and proper nouns would improve readability.

CATEGORY 3: Reader, Writer, Thinker (Updated w/ Revisions)

3a. Reader

When I read something confusing, I usually reread the section, then look for a summary or discussion online. But I’ve learned that wrestling with difficult texts often reveals new insights—I noticed this when annotating “Dover Beach” last week and realizing the “Sea of Faith” metaphor connected to modern uncertainties.

3a. Writer

I write best when I have a strong emotional connection to the topic. My free-write about my grandmother's garden flowed effortlessly compared to a lab report. To organize my thoughts, I like using sticky notes on my desk to physically move ideas around before drafting.

3a. Thinker

As a thinker, I'm starting to recognize how language shapes perspective. Watching a debate on climate policy showed me that the same data can be framed as urgency or alarmism depending on the words chosen. I want to use language responsibly—to inform, persuade, and sometimes comfort.

This self-portrait feels like building a compass: resilience keeps me steady, curiosity points me outward, empathy pulls me toward others, and discipline keeps me on course. My goals and priorities aren't fixed points—they'll shift as I grow—but this map will help me navigate the world and use language to move hearts and minds.
